are quite large and they contain many interesting stories. Brown used to read his speaches over to his wife before he delivered them in the Senate and I am told she helped him considerably in looking up his references. He was a good speaker and though he lacked oratorical elegance his words always carried weight. It is doubtful whether General Gordon will have as much strength in the Senate as he had, though it may be that his efforts will be more to the good of the state and less for life own good than Brown's have been.
